HOUSE OF DELEGATES.

Friday, January 22, 1782.

GENERAL CADWALADER having made the following motion, viz:

Whereas it appears by publications, in the Annapolis Gazette of the 23d and 30th August last, signed by Charles Carroll, Esq...

Mr. Carroll in his publications expressly alleged, or indirectly insinuated, that Mr. Chase had been guilty of a breach of his public trust...

the appropriation of it was so long protracted to the injury of the community. Although the history of this man's public conduct, is a history of outrages against the feelings and liberties of mankind...

It is of no consequence, that the confidence of the public, should be withdrawn from a man, who would sacrifice the dearest rights of America to the lusts of avarice and ambition? It is of no importance to society "that a man let loose upon its peace and happiness" should be hunted down? It is of no advantage to the state, that a faction, whose actions take their tone from the will of their unprincipled leader...

From your first entrance into the councils of this state, the real whigs have looked up to you as their guardian angels, and have considered your conduct as an antidote to the poisonous politics of this man and his party. It has been the first wish of our hearts, that by one bold effort you would crush his hopes, influence, and designs. We beheld with satisfaction, the advantages you obtained over him: you put his party, and impatiently waited for the day, when you should collect all your forces upon him, and by a grand coup de main acquire unending laurels for yourselves, and substantial benefits for your country. It was recorded in the annals of fate that this glorious triumph should distinguish the 15th of January 1782...

The public spirit and philanthropy, which inspired you to become prosecutors, can only be equalled by the wisdom, candour, and moderation you exhibited through the course of the painful business. You afforded a most interesting spectacle, — a sacred sensibility and melting humanity was then struggling with an earthshaking love of country. And a passion for an individual, pleading against the good of the community. The patriot triumphed over the man, and you acted a part worthy a Brutus, or a Regulus worthy of yourselves.

The unanimous suffrages of the immediate representatives of the people, two of the culprit's sons excepted, whose determination to acquit at events disqualified them as judges, has jet the seal of guilt on his conduct, and made the pe-

Street.
